

S. David Brazer | Bio

S. David Brazer (Ph.D. Stanford University) is an independent consultant who currently serves as the Director of Professional Learning for TeachFX, an education technology company. David has been a middle school and high school teacher in independent schools and a public high school assistant principal and principal. He served for 20 years as associate professor in the Stanford University Graduate School of Education and the College of Education and Human Development at George Mason University where he taught master's and doctoral courses ranging from general leadership principles to managing schools to organization theory as applied to school leadership. David's theory development and empirical research on strategic decision making, leadership, teacher learning, and organizational design have appeared in numerous peer-reviewed journals and edited volumes. He recently published Leading Schools to Learn, Grow, and Thrive: Applying Theory to Strengthen Practice (2019, Routledge) intended for prospective and practicing school leaders. He is the second author (with Robert G. Smith) of Striving for Equity: District Leadership for Narrowing Opportunity and Achievement Gaps (2016, Harvard Education Press) and (with Scott Bauer) of Using Research to Lead School Improvement: Turning Evidence into Action (2012, Sage Publications). David can be reached at dbrazer1210@gmail.com